COMIC OPERA IN THREE ACTS By JOHANN STRAUSS

FIRST PRODUCTION, VIENNA, 1874

The Baron Von Eisenstein has been committed to prison for eight days for insulting an official, partly through the inefficiency of his attorney, the stuttering Dr. Blind, and is to begin his imprisonment this day. His friend Notary Falke, however, persuades him to postpone it until the morrow and to accompany him to a ball at the residence of Prince Orlovsky, where he will meet the handsome ladies of the ballet. Falke has been at a masked ball the previous winter, costumed as a bat, and had been compelled by Eisenstein to walk to his home in broad daylight to the joy and amusement of the populace. He hopes to find an opportunity for vengeance at the coming ball. Eisenstein accepts the invitation, telling his wife he is going to prison, and taking a mournful farewell of her and the maid Adele, hastens with Falke to the ball. After his departure Rosalinde, his wife, is visited by a former admirer, the singing teacher Alfred, whose behaviour is rather free. Th night has set in and Frank, the Governor of the prison, has come to take Eisenstein to jail. He finds Alfred taking his ease attired in a dressing gown, and he, in order not to compromise Rosalinde, moved by her prayers, is induced to represent himself as Eisenstein and to accompany Frank. Falke, who has received plein pouvoir from Prince Orlovsky, has invited the governor of the prison, Frank, the maid Adele, and to complete the joke, Rosalinde, to be his guests at the ball. The latter, in order to observe her husband, appears masked. She is introduced by Falke as an Hungarian countess, and succeeds during an amorous tete-a-tete in pursuading her husband to loan her his valuable watch, to use in the future as a corpus delicti. Frank has paid court to Adele, and the next morning they all find themselves in prison, and the confusion increases, for Falke has introduced Eisenstein as Marquis Renard, Frank as Chevalier Chagrin and Adele as an actress. It is still further increased by the jailer, Frosch, who has profited by the absence of the prison director to become gloriously drunk. Adele arrives to obtain the assistance of the Chevalier Chagrin, Eisenstein to begin his prison term, Alfred wants to get out of jail, Rosalinde to see her husband, and Frank is still intoxicated. Frosch locks up Adele and her companion, and the height of the tumult has been reached when Falke arrives with all the guests of the ball and declares the whole as an act of revenge for the incident of the bat.
